

starvation. All this work was conducted quietly, with no publicity and no campaign, for the delicate political situation dictated utmost secrecy. The overwhelmingly grateful recipients of food and money in totalitarian Russia did not even know who had sent the life-saving goods, for the signature on the packages changed on each shipment.